Needham Online Safety Coalition

Online Safety from the Perspective of a Needham High School Student

Written by: Ray Winig, a NHS Senior.

Online Safety from the Perspective of a Needham High School Student:

Adolescent online safety and social media usage are critical issues for both caregivers and youth to be aware of. As a 17-year-old in Needham, these are issues concerning and pertinent to me and my life. Yet the most commonly used tactics for discussing internet usage go too far into an all-or-nothing approach, and what for a teen can feel like authoritative and unfair control by their parents/guardians.

We've seen the failures of abstinence-only sex education- telling young people to never engage in risky or potentially risky behaviors is ineffectual, and results in youth who don't know how to keep themselves safe in sexual situations. The same is true of online safety. Messaging that social media is unequivocally bad rings hollow for many teens, and we are subsequently left without any tools to actually stay safe online and protect our data and personal information. The online safety discussion can benefit greatly from a harm reduction framework, which recognizes simultaneously that the internet is becoming a larger part of our daily lives, can pose a variety of dangers, particularly to young people, and that there are strategies and habits that can help people be safe online and maintain a healthy relationship with social media and internet use.

That's why, particularly for older adolescents, it's critical for caregivers to work with their children. Young people, more often than not, want to stay safe online and not have social media constantly absorb their attention. But when told by adults that the internet is always negative or dangerous, it becomes easy to slip into a combative mindset. Though it seems self-evident, adolescents are also people, with a desire to exert their autonomy and values in their lives. The most productive relationships between caregivers and teens are those that strive to work as a team, recognizing a shared value of safety, the capacity of both parties to make good and bad choices, and that making mistakes is natural and part of learning, particularly for teens.

See this Online Safety Family Dialogue Guide, created by the Needham Online Safety Coalition, to help you start a conversation with your tween or teen.
